When the story first starts off the boy is all hyped up about the game. He is excited for the hockey game and to play against Mr. Ratchford. He thinks it's going to be easy because he's old and doesn't have proper equipment on, but Mr. Ratchford deceives him. He is an awesome hockey player and now the boy has to try a little harder. The boy then realizes that he has to try harder if he wants to score a goal. At first the boy came on the ice not knowing what was going to happen that day, but he was about to grow up. Mr. Ratchford had a lot to do with it because the boy noticed that just like life hockey was a struggle, he was trying to make a goal just like he was wanting to grow up. When he made his goal against his very own brother with the technique that his brother had taught him he felt a rush. He had finally grown up.

The boy had so much integrity and really tried hard, this particular game was a good challenge for him. It gave him the chance to score a goal and work hard in order to do it. Nobody saw it coming not even his own brother who he had taken the puck from. He felt a difference when him and his brother were walking home after the game, his voice was an octave lower, he received respect from his brother and his body felt transformed. As soon as he got the puck away from his brother it had all changed he was now going to be seen differently on the ice, he will have a lot more courage to try harder now knowing that he can score a goal. He now feels he can do anything.
